A spark of change

Time's up! Idris's voice rang out, signalling the end of the great invention challenge. The room fell silent as young inventors stepped back from their workstations, eyes fixed on their creations.

The audience buzzed with excitement as Nancy and Tom presented their inventions. Nancy showed off a sleek self-driving car, designed for speed, luxury and fame, while Tom unveiled a high-tech gaming console that promised virtual reality immersion and global success. Both creations were impressive, made for honor or power.

But as the applause died down, Idris's gaze wandered across the room. He wasn't just looking for inventions that would bring fame or riches. He was searching for something deeper - an invention that could make a true impact on the world. That's when his eyes landed on Ethan.

At the back of the room stood Ethan, a quiet boy whose invention seemed far simpler than those of the others. He stood there, shy and uncertain, clutching a small, unassuming box. His invention wasn't flashy, but there was something Idris couldn't quite put into words.

"Ethan," Idris called, his voice drawing attention. "Would you like to present your invention?"

Ethan stepped forward and opened the box to reveal a solar-powered device that transformed plastic waste into clean energy. "It's meant to help communities with pollution and energy shortages", he explained.

The room burst into laughter at hearing this poor boy talking about the most boring invention on Earth. Idris's voice silenced the laughter as he yelled, raging with fume. "Quiet! What I wanted wasn't an invention that gave you luxury and fame, but an invention that makes a positive and lasting impact on our world. This isn't about fame or fortune - it is about making a difference." And I think I have chosen my sidekick Ethan! congratulations!

Idris smiled. "Your invention speaks to the heart of what this competition is about. I would be honoured to have you as my sidekick."

Ethan's face lit up, a mix of surprise and gratitude. "Thank you Idris I promise to work hard and help make a difference."

Together, they embarked on numerous adventures, using their combined talents to solve problems and inspire others. Idris and Ethan showed that the true innovation isn't about fame or fortune, but about using creativity and kindness to make the world a better place for everyone, one invention at a time.
